Imagine that you are strolling along a tranquil beach in your swimsuit. Suddenly, a stranger walking toward you takes out their phone and starts recording you. You might work up the courage to ask how they dared to invade your privacy, and demand they delete the footage.

Fortunately, overt recording of people in public spaces is not as common as it could be, because it involves pointing a camera at someone. But it just became a lot easier with Facebook and Ray-Ban's new mainstream tool to secretly surveil people: Stories smart glasses (as pictured above).

Below, we'll unpack why you shouldn't buy these wearable surveillance cameras, why they can't be used safely in public spaces, and why Facebook and other companies need to prioritise human rights when developing "smart" glasses.
